WENDY'S WISDOM

One of more challenging parts of having a job that includes lots of travel is dealing with the weather. Last week I spent two days in Melbourne – maximum 11degrees, then two days in Sydney – pouring with rain.

The three constants are that flights will be delayed (practice patience); taxi drivers will want to discuss politics (how do they know so much) and I'll forget to pack something (another chance to improvise).

I was involved in an international conference about cyberbullying: It's of interest to note that the United States and the United Kingdom are wrestling with the same issues we are – importantly we're each seeing a greater take up of families wanting to be part of a solution and an emerging industry of ways to take Facebook entries down. Youth are starting a movement about the importance of protecting their privacy. Digital citizenship is the goal.

I was also speaking to school counselors about developing resilience in young children. It's important that we recognize none of us can be happy all of the time – but if we actively work towards being resilient, improving coping strategies and working on relationships rather than isolation – then we do tip the scales in the happiness direction.

I seem to remember to put effort into that – just wish I could do the same when it comes to packing scarves and gloves.

Last week we all had the opportunity to meet Georgia and Inez (thank you John G). Young people learning the value of giving to the community. I glanced through Georgia's workbook and it's a great Rotary program...think we might investigate given the number of primary school age children we have or can make contact with. It would be a great gift to start them on a Rotary path. Wendy
